Not illustrated. 1908 Excerpt: ... the conditions that produce a male organism and what the conditions that produce a female? It is obvious that in a world where everything is by law sex is not by chance, but what the law is we do not fully know. Still many facts have been gathered, and we are nearing the goal. The poultry business offers a peculiarly favorable field for investigation. When you reflect that perfect organisms may be produced in any number in the short space of twenty-one days, the parent fowls may be kept under such conditions as the investigator may wish and that these conditions may be varied at will, that the embryo may be followed through all the stages of its development, you realize at once what a field the poultry business presents for a study of the problem of sex, and the business takes on a new dignity and interest. Some very important facts bearing on sex have been gathered. The point on which investigators are more fully agreed is that nutrition has a profound influence upon sex. Beginning with insects it has been found that if caterpillars are starved before entering the chrysalis state the resultant butterflies or moths are males, while others of the same brood highly nourished are females. With bees, too, the relation between nutrition and sex seems equally well established. Experiments with tadpoles, which were supplied with a diet steadily increasing in sumptuousness, showed a steady and corresponding increase in the number of females produced. The proportion of females to males, which was originally fifty-seven to forty-three, rose steadily as the diet became more and more highly nutritious, until out of 100 tadpoles ninetytwo were females and eight males.

Coming up in the scale of life it has been found that among mammals the same principle holds, although...
