Not illustrated. 1868 Excerpt: ... I have done so for some years. Even his business matters--except just where his signature is necessary--are entirely transacted by me. You smile, as though you doubted my fitness for such a post; but, I assure you, I am very exact and methodical. Nay, I was only envying the attorney whom Mr. Crawford employs, said Carlyon, simply. Tone and gesture were both wanting, which should have accompanied a compliment so highfiown. The young girl blushed deeply, and there ensued an embarrassing pause. That drawing of yours reminds me, resumed Carlyon, pointing to the table, of the pretext on which I have ventured to intrude upon you. This sketch-book was found upon the sands this morning, as well as a campstool, which the finder will bring with him before night; it is yours, I conclude, although I am afraid it can be of no further use. Miss Crawford looked very grave at the sight of this memento of her late peril. I thank you much, Mr. Carlyon. It is useless, as you say, for its original purpose; but I am very glad to have it. It will serve to remind me of the Providence which mercifully preserved me in so terrible a strait; as well, added she, with frankness, of the brave gentleman who risked his life--nay, almost lost it--to save that of mere strangers. My unfinished sketch, I perceive --here her voice faltered in spite of her utmost efforts at selfcommand--has vanished from the block. Surely the sea could not have taken all the colour out. I assure you, dear Miss Crawford, on my honour, exclaimed Carlyon earnestly, that I have ventured to take no such liberty. The book is just as it came into my hands. Nay, there would have been no great harm, returne...
