Not illustrated. 1894 Excerpt: ... all day. Of all created things rabbits in covert are the most perverse and elusive. They dont want to be shot. Perhaps thats natural; but then theyre no sportsmen, for they dont give you the ghost of a chance of making ghosts of them. Yet Loder, my friend Loder, doesnt seem to feel this. He sees a flash of white fur in the thicket, and, while Im wondering whether I ought to fire, bang! the rabbits dead, and Loders score is increased by one. The beggar doesnt even trouble to put his gun to his shoulder always. Its not right. Another day I remember, a day when all the birds, moved by the diabolical impulse that sometimes afflicts them, would insist on going wrong. If we stood forward, with all proper regard for wind and every other circumstance, streams of feathered demons kept whirring back where Johnson, the sporting solicitor, missed them with a genial regularity that nothing could disturb. If we left our best guns back, as we did eventually in desperation, Johnson, who was placed forward, again stood under a canopy of pheasants, and shot, with brilliant success, into the gaps. The host was furious, the keeper was in sombre despair, the good shots were depressed, only Johnson was jubilant. On such occasions the only theory which is accepted as explaining the catastrophe is one that imputes a malignant cunning to the birds. This is the kind of conversation you will hear. Host (at the end of the beat).--Done again, by the living Jingo! Did you ever see such infernal birds? Ive shot this wood on the same plan for five years, and Ive never known the birds to go that way. Its perfectly sickening. The Keeper.--Ah, theyve fairly beat us this time, sir. Pity you didnt leave the two
