

Translators Habitus: A Study on Modulations in the Persian Translations of Faulkners The Sound and The Fury, Go Down Moses and Absalom! Absalom!

In this book, the Fundamental issue of translators habitus (Bourdieu 1990) has been explored with reference to the descriptive explanatory interpretive hypotheses about the translators text production activity while taking up John B. Thompsons synthetic translation of the concept of habitus (1991). The knowledge underlying such hypotheses will be accumulated from the study of culturalist approaches to the translators activity. It is argued that within the cultural-semiotic nature of the translating activity involving communicative turbulence (Hatim and Mason, 1991), shifts and in turn modulations turn into a natural condition of the translating activity. Based on the analysis of actual translations from the domain of English-Persian literary translation, the concept of modulation and its three types- namely; obligatory, optional and stylistic modulations, are identified redefined. Moreover, translators habitus and the treatment of translation norms in a particular community are approached from a new perspective.
