

Evils of Quarantine Laws, and Non-Existence of Pestilential Contagion: Deduced From the Phenomena of the Plague of the Levant, the Yellow Fever of ... the Cholera Morbus of Aisa (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Evils of Quarantine Laws, and Non-Existence of Pestilential Contagion: Deduced From the Phenomena of the Plague of the Levant, the Yellow Fever of Spain, and the Cholera Morbus of Aisa

My dear Sir

A Grateful recollection of the pleasant and instructive hours, which I was so fortunate as to pass in your converse at Madrid, when, abstracted from the avocations of a pursuit beset with jealousy, embarrassed by prejudice, and obstructed by intrigue, I found myself as it were suddenly transported into a region (small indeed, but choice) of freedom, sincerity, and friendship, naturally renders me desirous to mark the circumstances, by inscribing to you the fruits of my researches upon that occasion. It will be gratifying to me to be known, wherever these pages are read, as being deemed not unworthy the regard of man who devotes the energies of a superior mind, the influence of an ample fortune, and by far the greatest portion of his time, to the establishing of means of conferring the greatest sum of knowledge, in the shortest space of time, and consequently the greatest sum of happiness, prosperity, and power, on the rising generation of his countrymen.
