

The Gospel and Its Earliest Interpretations: A Study of the Teaching of Jesus and Its Doctrinal Transformations in the New Testament (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Gospel and Its Earliest Interpretations: A Study of the Teaching of Jesus and Its Doctrinal Transformations in the New Testament Athanase Coquerels little book on The First Historical Transformations of Christianity furnished the suggestion of this work. More than a suggestion, however, it cannot be said to have supplied. For while it is conceived in accordance with a generally correct insight into the relations of the different writings composing the New-Testament literature, its critical point of view may be regarded as now in many respects antiquated. The object of this work is to elucidate the teaching of Jesus and to present both in their relation to it and to one another the principal types of religious doctrine contained in the New Testament. The pursuit of this object has led to a consideration of the resemblances and differences which exist between the word of the Master and the interpretations of it by his followers who composed the several writings of that book. While the classification of the New-Testament literature results from critical processes, it was not consistent with the limits proposed to enter upon a detailed discussion of them, and no more has been attempted in this direction than to present those grounds of the classification adopted which are apparent from an analysis of the writings.
