Excerpt: ... no means quieted by reading one day an article on the business, submitted to me by Mr Liittell for his Commerce and Industries, in which he took occasion to remark of my literary undertakings: The scale on which he has commenced his work is so comprehensive that it is doubtful whether he will be able to complete it even if he should reach the age of three score and ten, with continuous prosperity and good health. I thereupon resolved to complete it, to postpone dying until this work was done, and I immediately ordered a dozen compositors to be put upon the manuscript. Matter equivalent to fifteen volumes was then in manuscript, and three fourths of the work on the remainder had been accomplished in the notetaking. I gave out, first, volume i. Central America, and then volume i. History of Mexico, both of which had been written long years before, and rewritten; after that I gave to the printers whatever part of the work appeared convenient, so that they frequently had several volumes in hand at one time. The utmost care was exercised in revising, rewriting, comparing, and verifying, as the work was passed to press, four or five persons devoting their time altogether or in part to this work. Further than this, not only would I print, but I would publish. I had no delicacy now in placing the imprint of the firm on my title-pages. The world might call it making merchandise of literature if they chose: I knew it was not, that is to say in a mercenary sense. There was no money in my books to the business, hence the business did not specially want them. In the publication of several extensive works the house had acquired a national reputation, and I was convinced that it would do better with this series of Pacific States histories, than any other firm. So I engaged M...
