

The Prime Minister, Volume II

The old Duke in so saying had spoken as it were his public opinion, -- giving, truly enough, to a few of his colleagues, such as Lord Drummond, Sir Gregory Grogam and others, the results of his general experience; but in his own bosom and with a private friend he was compelled to confess that there was a cloud in the heavens. The Prime Minister had become so moody, so irritable, and so unhappy, that the old Duke was forced to doubt whether things could go on much longer as they were. He was wont to talk of these things to his friend Lord Cantrip, who was not a member of the Government, but who had been a colleague of both the Dukes, and whom the old Duke regarded with peculiar confidence. I cannot explain it to you, he said to Lord Cantrip. There is nothing that ought to give him a moments uneasiness. Since he took office there hasnt once been a majority against him in either House on any question that the Government has made its own. I dont remember such a state of things, -- so easy for the Prime Minister, -- since the days of Lord Liverpool. He had one thorn in his side, our friend who was at the Admiralty, and that thorn like other thorns has worked itself out. Yet at this moment it is impossible to get him to consent to the nomination of a successor to Sir Orlando. This was said a week before the Session had closed.
