Not illustrated. 1881 Excerpt: ...They knew what was the result, whatever might have been the original intention of such a constitution. It had established the aristocratic principle in the widest and most noble sense of the term. But it had permitted all classes to aspire; and however society might be divided in olden days, there was no class which could say it did not possess the privilege of electing representatives to the House of Commons., from the proudest manorial lord to the humblest artisan. Less than a quarter of a century ago that was the iwknowledged state of things. However, they thought proper to terminate that scheme. It-was terminated by Lord John Eussell in his official capacity; enthusiastically supported by many members of the House. There was no member opposite who had not acquired his seat in the House by adopting the views of government, and the principles of the Eeform party. They were responsible for, and they ought to be grateful to, the Eeform Act. But now a great many gentlemen opposite seemed discontented with the settlement of 1832, who at that time were ready to vote black was white in its behalf--who went to the country for the bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill--who had so profoundly and so maturely investigated the question, that they resolved that the perfect scheme which they adopted should not be altered or modified, and who gave their deliberate consent to a change which they determined should be permanent. But ever since the bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill, had been gained, the result appeared to give only partial satisfaction. Querulous complaints of the law were constantly heard from hon. gentlemen opposite, who were sent to that House by the operation of that law, and who represented what were called liberal opinions in tha...
